

Introduction

It's cheap. It's cheesy.
And it's just what the liberals want.

Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11, by any objective standards, is cheaply done. It is a hodgepodge collection of video snippets, interviews and statements that appears to be almost thrown together. Most small to medium-sized organizations would not dare allow such low production values in a promotional video.

Why then has this pseudo documentary touched such a nerve with the left? Because Fahrenheit 9/11 implies an intricate series of lies and deceit by President Bush and supports Moore's own bizarre theories about this President and the war in Iraq. In 2004, it's pure gasoline on the liberal fire.

Moore hates war. Moore despises Bush.

Moore, a college dropout who never served in the military, uses his "documentary" to try and convince the public of two general themes throughout the movie:

- a) Politicians lie. Constantly. Incessantly. (Mostly for the ulterior motive of greed). And President Bush is Liar #1. Moore would have you believe that all actions of the President are taken to simply benefit the Bush family interests.

- b) War is not justified. Ever. There are no causes

worth fighting for and Saddam is a generally nice guy who never harmed any American. Oh yeah — and the army is made up of poor, undereducated kids who do not really represent America all that well.

Exposing 21 Moore Misleads

Moore is extremely careful not to out-and-out “lie” in the movie. Instead, his main modus operandi is to construct out-of-context film clips, and unrelated clips – all on the surface and taken individually to be true – and then string them together to imply deceit and lies and lead the viewer to connect the dots on some grand agenda that is working behind the scenes to orchestrate the events. Simply put, Moore has made an art out of misleading the viewer. While Moore succeeds on the surfaces with a cunning series of arguments, the entire movie falls apart quickly with a deeper look.

Challenging the Left's Articles of Faith

This booklet is designed to give those who seek the truth a quick primer on the real issues behind Fahrenheit 9/11. Why 21 misleads? Well, quite frankly, we had to stop somewhere!

This booklet also lends insight into what is driving the Left in this election year. And what is that? A deep-seated hatred for our Commander-In-Chief that is based on three Articles of Faith of the far left:

- George W. Bush stole the 2000 election.
- George W. Bush is incompetent.
- George W. Bush is a “misleader”, especially regarding the Iraq War.

Listen closely this Election year and you will hear

Michael Moore' s Misleads

these three themes repeated over and over again. And it all began on Election Day 2000 when the election was supposedly stolen by President Bush in some grand scheme involving none other than... Fox News.

Of course, that's where Michael Moore and Fahrenheit 9/11 begin. And so will we.
